HEAD SHOT OR PORTRAIT?

Headshots have a simple explanation: A portrait of a person with the bottom of the frame starting from mid-chest to the chin, and with the top of the frame being anywhere between mid-forehead to the top of the head.

When we use the term “portrait”, we use it in the sense of an environmental portrait: A picture of a person with other elements or background to help tell the story. Let me give you some examples:

- A judge with his robe using his bench as a background.
- A lawyer in the law library.
- A physician in a treatment room.
- A real estate agent in front of a sold sign.

Images above don't need words to tell you the profession of the subject, and when done expertly, it came make the subject seem even more adept at their trade.

Who uses which?

Headshots

Headshots are commonly used by business professionals on websites that list employees, officers, agents and so forth.

Portraits

Some business professionals may also get portraits. For example: in annual reports. Personalities like broadcasters, writers, athletes benefit from portraits that depict their profession. Portraits are also often used for advertising and editorials.
